

Molly teaches Business, Personal Finance, and Math at Lorain High School in Ohio. This is her fifth year as a teacher, deciding to make a mid-life career change. In teaching, Molly has found her passion and can't imagine having a job that doesn't involve working with students. Molly is a member of her school's Principal's Advisory and PBIS Committees, is a Building Technology Coordinator and serves as a member of the District Leadership Team district Wellness Committee. In addition, she is a member of the Lorain Lions Club, advising the Lorain High School Leo Club, co-advises the Lorain High School Pep Club, and is a member of the Lorain Kiwanis organization.

Prior to teaching, Molly worked mostly in higher education settings, including The University of Findlay, the University of Toledo, Cleveland State University, and Oberlin College. In addition, she was Program Manager for the Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses Program in Cleveland at Cuyahoga Community College. Molly started her own educational consulting business, Common Sense Defense, in 2014 helping local school districts comply with state legislation regarding crisis management planning and active shooter training. Molly has held a variety of other jobs including cashier, sales associate, operations manager, project manager, and project coordinator working in the retail, trades, manufacturing, and construction industries.

Molly has two children. Her daughter, Mackenzie, is a junior at Ohio University double majoring in Wildlife Conservation Biology and Photojournalism. Her son, Ben, is a junior in high school and plays on the varsity soccer and track teams. She also has two dogs - Sadie and Cooper. She loves watching documentaries and crime shows, can quote every The Big Bang Theory episode, and enjoys brain teasers
